

CARTHAGE
COLLEGE

The Samuel and Berry
Shoen Collection of Soviet Art

Collection Summary

The Carthage College collection of one hundred and thirty-one paintings from the Soviet era represents a cross-section of the extensive body of work created by artists who lived in the USSR. It contains works by renowned artists, recipients of the Stalin Prize and other important state awards, members of major art movements and art associations of the Soviet era, as well as regional artists. It constitutes a representative body of work from the time period. It also boasts several examples of the pre-Soviet and post-Soviet works.

Most of the artists in the Collection were members of the Artists' Union of the USSR and its various branches. Thus, they were part of the official art establishment at the time when public discourse was heavily controlled by the ideological apparatus of the Soviet state and the Communist Party. The major vehicle of control was the USSR Artists' Union and some other organizations, such as state museums, art publications, and mass media.

Soviet art is a unique phenomenon in the history of world art. It existed outside the art market for seven decades and was not subject to market regulation. Instead, it was regulated by ideological concerns that were, most of the time, not the concerns of the artists themselves but rather imposed on them by the ruling Party's ideological apparatus.

The Carthage College Collection is an important resource for studying the functioning of cultural production under oppression. It provides plentiful research material that helps theorize how material conditions and social relations shape culture and understand the specifics of cultural production under state socialism. It also allows us to examine individual strategies Soviet artists chose to navigate the dangerous waters of the heavily censored cultural space, vacillating between survival and servility on the one hand and creativity and independence on the other. The collection provides material to uncover narratives that Soviet artists contributed to the public discourse – inspired by, or sometimes divergent from, official Soviet ideologies. It also provides pictorial material to learn about art styles and techniques prevalent in Soviet art.
